

NEPED: An Example of the Application of Ethnobotany to Conservation and Community Development

Yvngata Nelson and Gifford Wilson
Project Operations Unit, NEPED

The participants at this symposium were acquainted with details of the work of NEPED as a social project through field visits, conversations with staff and participating farmers. The National Environmental Foundation and Institute for Management Development (NEFD) recently completed a five-year project undertaken by the State Government in partnership with the help of the International Development Research Centre (IDRC) and NEPED. The project was aimed at strengthening the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term. It has provided support for NEPED's operations and management activities. The project was completed in 2002.

Field Exercises and Site Actions

The above and previous projects and other initiatives to provide technical support to farmers and communities.

The overall goal of the project was to strengthen the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term. The project was aimed at strengthening the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term. The project was aimed at strengthening the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term.

Working for the improvement of the operations of NEPED in 2002. The project was aimed at strengthening the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term. The project was aimed at strengthening the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term.

Improving operations and management activities. The project was aimed at strengthening the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term. The project was aimed at strengthening the capacity of NEPED to manage its operations in the long term.